

THEN

It was 9.22, the moment when everything stopped. First there was the burning air, then came the darkness, the fire, and finally the frost. Now, in a frozen, wasted London, a woman - uncertain even of her own name - is fighting to stay alive. Along with a small group of fellow survivors, she takes refuge in an abandoned skyscraper in what...

Reader's Opinions

Myerson does a slow, powerful build of emotion like no one else, and this is one of her best: beautiful, hauntingly lovely, and heart-breakingly sad. As you slowly begin to grasp what has happened to Izzy, it's almost too much to bear, until you realise who and what she really is at the beginning of the story.

I hated every single word of this book. Yet, almost a whole year after reading it, it is still with me. Almost scene by scene, carved into my memory. That makes it a very successful narrative, right? It made me angry, every page of it. I wanted to rip it, burn it. It was very, very difficult to read. Moreover, the ending is extremely...
