

DEVILS CHIMNEY

In Anne Landsman's complex debut novel , The Devil's Chimney, middle-aged Connie Lambrecht lives a life of quiet desperation in a rural South African outpost called Oudtshoorn, where she runs a dog kennel, quietly suffers the abuse of her weak-willed husband Jack, and drinks to excess. Faced with such unremitting misery, it's no wonder that Connie becomes obsessed with two stories from the past: first, the disappearance of a colored servant girl in the Congo Caves, and second, an upper-class...

Reader's Opinions

Interesting story, about a woman taking over a farm for her husband in Africa, but went off into the metaphysical deep end near the end of the story, which I didn't particularly enjoy. I was annoyed by the use of Afrikaaner throughout the book; I had to flip to the glossary in the back, and I don't feel the sprinkling of words...
